Winchester Poems

Ammunition, Or Sarah Winchester, 23 Years Dead, and My Grandmother, Newly Widowed, Speak

The men were paid extra: danger money. No metal buttons on their clothes, no cigarettes,

In his letters from the South Pacific, he always called me Honey, made me promise not to forget no matches. No hairpins for the women-So many precautions: fire brigades waiting, > to smile for him in the beveled mirror he'd bought that Christmas—home on leave—deep wells, until there were hydrants. Around the factories, even the horses wore bells everywhere like the sound of ice cracking when he drove the lake. I'd hold my door open-brass instead of steel underfoot. Less chance of sparks. The men worked overtime-> frightened. The months he was gone were like that. The children in the back of the car, gearing up for each new war, or maybe war. Their shirts couldn't have pockets.

holding the shells he'd sent them: speckled around a tiny curve of breath. Until the telegram,

No stray bits of metal. And still—each year explosions, fires spreading until

> I kept my promise: smiled as if he could see my reflection in the bevel of the South Pacific.

they couldn't count the bodies.

Before his ship was only splinters, smoke

As a child, I thought guncotton sounded soft-like the cloth for a veil.

Sarah Winchester Remembers: Artizan Street, New Haven, 1850s

There was always something being built in my father's shop and sawdust tracked onto our floors: a shimmer like the boards were becoming mist, like on the Quinnipiac where my parents met. You could walk into rivers then and come out with new beliefs.

In the clock shops, time divided, shifting us forward notch by tiny notch. People crowded the Public Bathhouse-vapors and lye and seawater. Small salvations. From my French tutor: pere and bois. What paid for my lessons: fine houses ornamented by my father's careful hands.

Carriage works, mills, the boarding houses spilling into the streets. We lived comfortably then. My sister, the only one buried. I carried her name, like the rail tracks carrying Hartford outside its skins: the elm-lined, sooty Green, the custom house. Factories for shirts and guns.

In their rooms, new girls from Ireland cut stacks of pieces—collar and breast, left right, back—then stitch by stitch, created a more perfect wholeness. The country was coming apart. Rumors. Repeating guns. But also beauty. New planed maple.

Everyone wanted spindles and tracery, moldings copied from Queen Victoria and The Crystal Palace. History turned against its lathe, shaving us loose. On my father's floor: pedals for organs waiting for the music to be built around them. No one told me to want a more solid world.

Stereoscope: Annie Oakley and Sarah Winchester

It began with necessity: hunting rabbits behind that mortgaged house, then word spread out: snow on the fields, glinting off sky, and everything narrowed to hard wood and steel, and me the small miracle at the trigger men bet against:

How can I explain windows designed from guns: levers and latches aimed at the gazing ball in the garden, not for safety but because that's how I knew to build. Not a spider, silking out her body's web, but a woman standing cards riddled like windows on a train that will take you over oceans if you want it to; the prince of Senegal sending offers of tigers, and the German kaiser sitting rigid as a portrait: ash of his cigarette streaking the bullet as it crumbled that one speck where the wind's eye watches without sleeping—safe as houses they say, but what is safe about this world with holes shot through, with empty safes and chairs—this dust and light on the piano, the smoke and no one else to warm at the hearth now: only my own body of fire. Such trust in common stranger's (woman's) hands; the legends made them safe the way they do: the little sure shot, dressed to kill, meaning dressed to shoot at nothing alive now. I became something to be braved, boasted glass-between me and the day: not ghosts, but not the living either. The legends grew like hedges tangled and vined around me; words, the spirits I started to believe in because what else is a house but something that holds time, something to forgive us, as any woman should holding her gun naturally as a baby slung from her body. Love has nothing to do with that or it does, but also wanting to trust something also our bodies bare as skinned rabbits, and the floor cold sleepless walks through rooms held in some other world we've built board by board; the window open or closed and us still standing waiting wanting someone to see us wanting_something soft as silk, so maybe we are spiders where the bed isn't, and all the pretty ways later we sell to the world what began with necessity after all-this web around us, plums in the orchards, morning filling up the glass: something beautiful in every corner. How can I explain it?

Sarah Winchester Visits The California Midwinter Exposition, Golden Gate Park, 1894

Surely you did not see the woman dancing nude at the new aquarium—a thin black veil over her face, not so unlike your own. The cracking of chairs as the police came to carry her offlike a spider in a cup-to somewhere proper. Were there even fish yet? Were there seals caught beneath Cliff House—so thick, the papers wrote, you could shoot them from the veranda if it weren't illegal. They wrote everything then: back at your farm you named a hill Strawberry for here—invited the neighborhood girls to its slope to eat real French ice cream. That woman, surely, nude by those glass walls, danced tarantella, trying to survive the bite of her own skin: just that veil between the gawkers and grief. At the grand Egyptian revival pavilions, a ferris wheel of oranges turned by electric motor. You could stand underneath—watch a hundred suns revolve at once: an eccentric belief that the world stood still here, one room could hold everywhere. The Court of Honor.

The Prune Knight with his armor: a bloom of produce bristling from his chest. Sphinxes with soft plaster noses. Germans-painted and dressed like Japanese (who refused to be servants)—running with rickshaws by Dante's Inferno, House of Horrors, where you could pay—for a short forever—for your past.
